PREFACE

IN THE PREPARATION OF THIS EDITION, THE OBJECTIVE HAS BEEN TO PRESENT A PANORAMIC PICTURE OF MODERN MUSIC AND THOSE PERSONALITIES WHO HAVE CONTRIBUTED TO ITS COLOR AND PROGRESS. THIS IS THE PRODUCT OF A SINCERE ATTEMPT TO COMPILE ALL ESSENTIAL INFORMATION CONCERNING THE VARIOUS PHASES OF THE MUSIC ARTS WHICH MAY BE OF INTEREST TO THE ARTIST, TEACHER, WRITER, STUDENT, CONCERT-GOER, RADIO-LISTENER AND RECORD-ENTHUSIAST.

WHO IS WHO IN MUSIC PAYS THE WORLD'S RESPECT AND HOMAGE TO THE DRAMATIS PERSONAE OF THE CONTEMPORARY MUSICAL SCENE, AND PRESENTS A CLOSEUP OF MUSIC EVENTS, TRENDS, ACCOMPLISHMENTS AND DEVELOPMENTS. IT REFLECTS THE GLORY OF THE PRESENT—FOR THE APPRECIATION OF TODAY AND ADMIRATION OF THE FUTURE. THE SCENE WILL CHANGE, OF COURSE, BUT THIS EDITION WILL REMAIN A PERMANENT RECORD OF THE CAST OF CHARACTERS AND OF THEIR PERFORMANCE.

SINCERE THANKS ARE HEREBY EXTENDED TO THE MANY INDIVIDUALS WHOSE PROMPT AND EFFICIENT COOPERATION MADE THE PUBLICATION OF THIS VOLUME A POSSIBILITY, ABOVE ALL, OUR ESTEEMED EDITORIAL BOARD AND MANY DISTINGUISHED CONTRIBUTORS. HOWEVER, AMONG SO MANY WHO DESERVE THIS APPRECIATION, IT IS IMPOSSIBLE TO SINGLE OUT EVEN A FEW NAMES, AND THOSE WHO HAVE EARNED SPECIAL CREDIT MUST BE SATISFIED WITH THE KNOWLEDGE THAT THEIR ASSISTANCE IS FULLY RECOGNIZED BY THE ENTIRE PUBLICATION STAFF.

INTRODUCTION

WHO IS WHO IN MUSIC IS UNIQUE IN ITS SCOPE, FOR IT IS MUCH MORE THAN A COLLECTION OF BIOGRAPHIES OF PROMINENT PERSONAGES IN MUSIC. COVERING AS IT DOES THE MANIFOLD PHASES OF THE MUSIC WORLD OF TODAY, IT IS, IN TRUTH, AN ENCYCLOPEDIA BOTH ENTERTAINING AND INSTRUCTIVE.

THE MANY PEOPLE WHO HAVE CONTRIBUTED THEIR EFFORTS TO THE PRODUCTION OF THIS PUBLICATION HAVE ENDEAVORED TO PRESENT WITHIN THE CONFINES OF THIS VOLUME AS MANY DATA AS POSSIBLE CONCERNING THE PRESENT MUSIC SCENE. ON THE FOLLOWING PAGES THERE MAY BE FOUND OVER ONE HUNDRED ARTICLES ON SUBJECTS RANGING FROM SYMPHONY TO SWING, BIOGRAPHIES, PICTURES, DIRECTORIES, A MASTER RECORD CATALOGUE, DIVERSIFIED SURVEYS, AND MANY OTHER FEATURES TOO NUMEROUS TO INTRODUCE IN THIS BRIEF PREFATORY NOTE.

IT AFFORDS US NO SMALL SATISFACTION, AS MEMBERS OF THE EDITORIAL BOARD, TO STATE THAT HEREIN NO BRANCH OF MUSICAL ENDEAVOR OR INTEREST HAS BEEN NEGLECTED. WE ARE CONFIDENT THIS BOOK AFFORDS A DISTINCT AND VALUABLE SERVICE TO ALL WHO ARE INTERESTED IN MUSIC, AS WELL AS TO THE CAUSE OF MUSIC ITSELF.

THE CONTEMPORARY MUSICAL SCENE

By OSCAR THOMPSON

"What of the war?" The question is one that cannot be evaded by anyone attempting to make a survey of the contemporary musical scene.

War has never advanced music, but music has advanced through every period of modern history in spite of war. Music inspired by war, like "Wellington's Victory or the Battle of Victoria," even when composed by a Beethoven, has gained no abiding place among the perdurable masterpieces of the tonal art. But war and the rumors of war could not prevent Beethoven from creating the "Eroica" and other great works of the time when Napoleon's armies marched over Europe and kingdoms oscillated on the map. Brahms wrote a "Triumphlied" and Wagner a "Kaisermarch" to commemorate the German victory of 1870, but neither can be considered an important work or representative of the greater gifts of its composer. Of about the same time are the Brahms Variations on a Theme by Haydn and Wagner's "Götterdämmerung," works of the highest creative genius and unmistakably characteristic of the musical personalities that created them.

The last great war bequeathed no great music to the world, though it influenced indirectly trends of composition, chiefly through revolt or reaction—according to the point of view—against the somewhat decadent post-romanticism of the years immediately preceding the cataclysm of 1914. But there may be a tendency to forget that the era of experimentation that resulted in the so-called "modern music" was well under way before the World War began. Schönberg's "Pierrot Lunaire" was written in 1912, Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" in 1913, Bartók's "Allegro Barbaro" in 1910, Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" before the outbreak of hostilities in 1914. Where the World War was most balefully an influence was in the careers cut short by death, most conspicuously among performers, with no doubt some as yet unmatured creative talent of a high order snuffed out before it had reached the ear of the world.

Beyond the direful detonations of the guns in Europe, similar tragedies are in the making. In America the influence of the war undoubtedly is in the direction of a still greater reliance on our own musical resources, with some further diminution of our former reliance on Europe for new compositions, new artists and the development of new trends in music, though the flood of refugee musicians from Central Europe has raised new problems of assimilation of alien elements at the very time that there is the greatest emphasis on musical self-sufficiency. Particularly in the matter of the tardy development of the American conductor, without whom the American composer may never occupy so favorable a position as his European contemporary, the sudden and considerable influx of experienced men, ready to take over the leadership of any kind of ensemble, may mean further obstacles and delays for the native talent. It may be argued that few Americans have the requisite training for orchestral, operatic or even choral leadership. How they are to obtain this training, if experienced aliens are to have the preference for even the small posts, is an issue not to be dismissed as mere chauvinism. The far-flung Federal Music Project has given many Americans opportunities to conduct programs of symphonic and other music. But what has come out of it, or may be expected to come out of it, by way of offsetting the many recent additions to the waiting list of sojourners from abroad, is too confused for analysis or even conjecture today.

One appreciable change in the international aspects of music is to be found in the increased mutual interest, one for the other, of North and South (or Latin) America. Programs of music by composers of Brazil, Argentine, Chile and other neighbors have assumed a new place in the musical calendar of New York and some other cities, although what has been accomplished to bring the two continents closer together must be regarded as only a beginning. At the World's Fair in New York in the summer of 1939, and subsequently at concerts of the League of Composers and the Schola Cantorum in the same city, the music of Brazil has had particular attention. Today, the names of Villa-Lobos of Brazil and Carlos Chavez of Mexico have much more than the shadowy meaning they had for Americans a few years ago. Aside from the reciprocity which may mean that South and Central America will hear much more North American music, and vice versa, the European conflict should result in Latin America turning to the musical managements in the United States for more and more artists to supply their celebrity programs and casts, both in the concert and the operatic fields. Thus, both music as an art and music as a business may undergo appreciable changes because of a closer relationship between the Americas.

Composition

The composer, as has been so well said, is the source of all music, though the public too often forgets this in its adulation of the conductors, the singers, the instrumentalists and the ensembles whose mission it is to serve as interpreters. All things considered, the general standard of performance may be higher today than it ever has been. But the world situation with respect to composers is one about which much ink has been spilled, and not because of an embarrassment of riches in the creation of new works of recognizable genius. In Finland, Sibelius; in Germany, Strauss; on the highways of the world, Rachmaninoff—these represent at its apex what remains to our times of the old order, against which the "modernists" of an era now closing launched their revolt just before and for some years after the last great war. The eighth symphony of Sibelius has yet to be performed, if indeed it is not still unfinished. Strauss's most recent operas, "Friedenstag" and "Daphne," have yet to tempt any impresario, outside of Germany, where, for reasons that may not be entirely those of the merit of the works, they have not become staples of the repertoire. Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini, with its provocative use of the Dies Irae, would appear to be the product of a certain bitterness in exile, as well as of a virtuoso technique. It is not in music of this order, or music from the composer whose outlook is primarily a retrospective one, that the essentials of the present day in composition are to be found. Rachmaninoff is 67, Strauss is 76, Sibelius nearing 75. The perspective is a clearer one if it is realized that Debussy, if he had lived, would have been only two years older than Strauss, and three years older than Sibelius.

But among yesterday's modernists, some of the most celebrated are no longer young. Stravinsky is 58, Bartók 59, Schönberg, 65. Others, like Hindemith and Krenek, are in middle life, the one 45, the other 40. It is difficult to find younger men who may be said to occupy the positions of world prominence that each of these composers occupied at thirty, by which time Stravinsky had produced "The Firebird" and "Petrushka," Bartók his "Allegro Barbaro" and the "Deux Images," Schönberg his "Verklärte Nacht," Hindemith his "Nusch-Nuschi" dances and various examples of his "Kammermusik," and Krenek his "Jonny Spielt Auf."

The larger world of music may not have taken the music of some of these composers much to heart, but their pioneering made them figures of world repute, if only through controversy. In some quarters, Prokofieff is regarded today as the composer who at the moment is coming into his own. Born in 1891, he is the senior of both Hindemith and Krenek. The 33-year old Shostakovich has not subsequently been so successful outside of Russia—or at least in America—as he was with his first symphony, composed when he was 20. Young Russia, otherwise, is much of a blank musically to the Western world. France has no composer of the stature of either Debussy or the more recently departed Ravel. War-rocked Spain has not replaced the popular Falla; England, with a multitude of able men like Vaughan Williams, Bliss, Bax, Bridge, Bantock and others of pre-war roots, has not filled the place of Elgar (nor yet of Sullivan!); Scandinavia has its grand old man in Svendson—nearing the century mark——but his productive years were those of Grieg, who was, indeed, by three years the younger man.

America's composers are many and so are their styles. A separate article would be necessary to discuss with any degree of fairness or discrimination their continuing contribution. But there is no escaping the circumstance that at the moment no one stands clearly enough beyond his fellows to occupy a position such as can be conceded to the foreign composers named in the foregoing; or, for that matter, the position quite generally accorded Edward MacDowell. The third symphony of Roy Harris may be said to have enjoyed recently an especial favor with conductors and audiences. Certain works by Howard Hanson and Aaron Copland—to name but two of a list that could be extended indefinitely—have had performances in encouraging number. Perhaps never before has this country been so American-composer conscious, among the indications of this being the controversial letters, often directed at the critics, that have appeared in metropolitan and other newspapers. But the great American composer—or composers—about whom may be rallied a national music comparable to the national musics of France, Italy, Germany, the old Austria, Hungary, Bohemia and Russia, is still to make his powers known. Talent there is in abundance; genius there may be, but it has yet to prove its case.

Composition everywhere would appear to be seeking to return to the main highway, though it is still too early to say that the experimental and revolutionary trends of the last quarter of a century have, indeed, led the ultraists into a cul-de-sac. There has been much writing in a vacuum—composers for composers—with little contact, in many instances, with the larger musical public. But it is scarcely to be denied that the technical resources of composition have been advanced. It was not primarily because of the application of new harmonic theories such as atonality and polytonality that much or most of the music of the post-war modernists made little appeal outside of an inner circle of neoterics; it was because of the lack of recognizable genius, comparable to that of the older composers whom the ordinarily experienced musical public continued to prefer.

Performance

In virtually every department of performance, the supply of first-rate artists is more than equal to the demand, even though it is contended that in singing and more particularly operatic singing the supply runs to certain types, which involves the sacrifice of other types. As a recitalist, the American singer of today meets the requirements of American audiences quite as satisfactorily as any of the imported artists, though in the specialized field of German Lieder he may have to acknowledge an occasional superior. In opera, the Americans may be said to have saved the day for Italian opera at the Metropolitan, due to an inexplicable shortage of important new Italian voices. Americans have had a place in German opera also, but not to the extent of the earlier era of Whitehill, Griswold, Hinckley, Blass and others. Basses, sopranos and contraltos are more numerous than tenors; today there is a serious question as to what should be done about the many fine high baritones the country is producing. This would seem to be the American voice.

Success in opera has attended American singers for more than a century. But with access to the small opera companies of Europe practically cut off, even before the outbreak of the present war, the matter of suitable training and preliminary experience before the footlights has become an increasingly vexatious one. America has two prime musical needs. More opera houses and smaller ones. Experience in the secondary institutions of Europe is now scarcely to be thought of; but, as yet, this country has developed little to take its place, though undoubtedly some productions by local groups have given the cause of opera, and with it of the American singer, a fresh and valuable impetus in this country.

Probably there are more first-rate violinists in the world today than at any time in the past. "Ah, but it is no longer difficult to play the violin" was the summing up by a symphony orchestra concert master of the state of technical preparedness now commonly confronted in the concert halls. This, of course, is persiflage. But so widespread is the command of technical resources—with effects that once were the exclusive property of a Paganini or a Sarasate now to be found in the armory of boys and girls in the prodigy stage of development—that the statement has at least the value of shifting the attention to interpretative considerations. The standard violin literature still stands in need of fresh material, but it has to be confessed that the requirements of the instrument, so admirably served by many of the compositions that have been worn threadbare, are not in agreement with the style and the ends of sundry new works which represent some idiom of composition but not the idiom of the violin.

As instances of successful additions to violin literature in recent years may be named the second Prokofieff concerto (1935)—the first was composed before the World War; Ravel's "Tzigane" (1924) and Castelnuovo-Tedesco's rondo-poem, "The Lark" (1930). The now frequently played Sibelius concerto, once considered forbidding and unrewarding, dates back to 1903, though revised two years later. These and other works of the present century have imposed problems of performance, chiefly in the way of awkward or unviolinistic passages, but little that is new has come into violin technique as the result. A player who has not specialized in the newer music, Fritz Kreisler, has been credited with extending the uses of vibrato to rapid passages and the so-called Auer school has put its hallmark on much of the bowing of the times.

First rank technicians are similarly plentiful among the pianists of the day. As part of music's "Brave New World" after the last war there was a definite reaction against the romantic style of playing, with its eternal quest of nuance and caress of tone. As was true of various other manifestations of art, the "sentimental" was avoided at all costs. The percussive in piano style was cultivated and some composers made use of the instrument almost as if it were a xylophone—Stravinsky's Capriccio (1929) supplies an example. There is still xylophonic playing and xylophonic composing. But the percussive has not triumphed over the caressive. Surviving pianists of the elder day have their followers among the younger keyboard virtuosi who are unabashed romanticists, at least in the playing of romantic music. Debussy has remained the greatest single influence on piano playing in the new century, but that by way of an extension of tonal subtlety rather than by its abolition or curtailment. Whether in composition or performance, the "machine" fixation of a few years ago is distinctly less fashionable than it was. More than any European country, America has become a land of two-piano teams. In total number these may have reached their peak several years ago, with some winnowing out in the last two or three seasons. But public interest in programs of this type would appear to be one of the continuing factors in the presentation of artist courses throughout the United States.

Since the passing of Caruso in 1921, the world of the voice has had no universal idol. The success that since 1935 has made a historic figure of Mme. Flagstad has been preponderantly American, so much so that the Wagnerians of Central Europe have been reluctant to concede to the Norse soprano her full and just stature as an artist of superlative endowment. The ascendancy of her star has coincided with a new period of ascendancy for the Wagnerian music dramas in New York, with the Wagnerian casts much the strongest the Metropolitan Opera Association could muster. In the time of Caruso the Metropolitan often was referred to as "an Italian opera house" and it was Italian opera that presented individual singers and casts of the greatest distinction. With the passing of that era, American artists, with Lawrence Tibbett the one of longest service among those now at the Metropolitan —he made his debut there in 1923—have played a preponderant part in upholding the standards of the Italian repertoire. Among Italian principals now with the company, only the veteran tenor Martinelli, who joined the organization ten years before Tibbett's debut, is a survivor of the Caruso era. Equally true, however, of the so-called German wing is the prominence of singers who are not Germans. Mme. Flagstad is a Norwegian, Mmes. Thorborg and Branzell are Swedes, Melchior is a Dane, Schorr a Hungarian, Liszt an Austro-American, Kipnis a Russian. The limitations placed on an article of this type prevent a general discussion of America's operatic institutions, but what is true of singing at the Metropolitan is applicable in a general way to singing at the Chicago City Opera and the San Francisco Opera, which sometimes correspond closely to the Metropolitan in their casting, while also presenting artists not familiar at the New York house.

In the recital field are encountered many of the same singers that are heard in opera. They also are among the best known names of radio and some few have had success in the films. There are only a few distinctive recitalists who have devoted themselves exclusively or primarily to concert work. This may account, in part at least, for a scarcity of really notable soloists at oratorio performances, as compared to times past, though there also are budgetary reasons for the now quite common substitution of competence for distinction. It may be the explanation also for a lack of Lieder specialists who could be compared to Wullner, Culp and Gerhardt in times not far past. There are, of course, good singers of Lieder today. But with one or two exceptions their song programs cover so wide a range of material as to raise a question as to whether the singer has not become more important than the song. Often the musical material seems to have been selected on the widest possible basis, so as to exhibit the facets of a particular vocal personality, rather than on the contrary basis of the artist being dedicated to the fullest and deepest exposition of the composers he or she is best equipped to serve. The principles of good voice production are probably more widely disseminated today than ever before; but a question remains as to whether Lieder, at the one extreme, and operatic coloratura, at the other, have not both suffered through the lack of that specialization such as would materially limit the range of singers' programs in the cause of an increased depth of utterance on the one hand, and a more highly perfected technique on the other. The subject is not one on which singers, teachers, critics and lay listeners may be expected to agree, but the arguments of the believer in specialization have had new and strong emphasis in the recent writings of Ernest Newman of the London Sunday Times and others keenly interested in the vocal art.

Ensembles

The day is one of virtuoso conductors and virtuoso orchestras. With allowances made for varying results under different leaders, it can be said that America's chief symphonic ensembles have maintained a level of unparalleled excellence. For the time being, a majority of Europe's most important orchestras are out of the picture, save as they may minister to the particular needs of the countries at war. Internationally, there is at the moment no real challenge to the eminence of a half-dozen front rank American orchestras. In the concerts of the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Chicago Symphony and the relatively new NBC Symphony, is a concentration of all that is most admired in orchestral performance today, with the orchestras of Cincinnati, Cleveland, Detroit, Minneapolis, Pittsburgh, San Francisco, Los Angeles, St. Louis, Washington, Kansas City, Indianapolis and Seattle also serving as leaders among the ensembles that have made the entire nation symphony minded. The contribution of the many orchestras maintained under the recently curtailed Federal Music Project can scarcely be over-estimated, irrespective of the most variable standards of performance. And as one of the important factors in a situation whereby it is no longer necessary to import players from abroad, the training orchestra of the National Orchestral Association in New York must be looked upon as one of the most fruitful enterprises of the times.

Chamber music is in no sense a Cinderella in America's musical life. There probably are more string quartet concerts than at any time in the past. Virtually every European group of reputation in the homeland has competed with quartets of players resident in America for the favor of audiences that have been found increasingly responsive to quartet playing from year to year. The trio and other forms of chamber ensemble, if not equally popular with the quartet, have certainly not diminished in appeal. The remarkable success of the concerts of the New Friends of Music in New York, covering the entire range of chamber music performance, from the work for two instruments (or voices) to that for chamber orchestra, would seem to indicate that chamber music devotees have multiplied at a rate more nearly comparable to that which has marked the growth of symphony audiences than had been realized before this enterprising organization was launched.

Chorally, there undoubtedly is room for progress. As the first form of ensemble to take real root in America, the large chorus came into its own earlier than the symphony, the opera or chamber music in communities where these other types of ensemble were impracticable or too expensive a luxury. The honorable traditions of the past have been maintained, not only at great festivals like those in Worcester, Bethlehem, Cincinnati, Ann Arbor and Evanston, but in the concerts of organizations like the Schola Cantorum, the Oratorio Society and the Dessoff Choirs in New York. Other cities have, of course, comparable choral institutions, some of long and distinguished history. A separate article would be necessary even to catalogue them adequately. The National Federation of Music Clubs has continued to foster choral singing as one of its many and productive activities. The American Choral and Festival Alliance has made it the prime purpose of its work. In the universities and colleges the standard of choral singing has been steadily raised, partly as the result of the establishment of music departments headed by musicians unwilling to be a party to the older type of college glee club program. But the American public is at present much more orchestrally-minded than it is chorally-minded and only a perennial few of the great choral masterpieces, like "Messiah," "Elijah," the Bach B Minor Mass and the St. Matthew and St. John Passions are heard with any degree of regularity by countless music lovers who are made familiar year after year with the standard symphonies.

Most of America's historic festivals are held in the Spring or the Autumn, hence present no conflict in time with open air summer concerts (chiefly orchestral) such as those at the Hollywood Bowl, Lewisohn Stadium in New York, Robin Hood Dell in Philadelphia, Grant Park and Ravinia at Chicago and the Chautauqua and Cincinnati Zoo summer opera seasons. The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., which takes place in August, is primarily a season of summer orchestral concerts. Meanwhile, European festivals have been reduced to a handful, all of which might vanish with a whirl of the wheel of war.

Teaching and Education

More and more it is to be noted that Americans are studying at home and this by preference. War conditions doubtless will limit still further and perhaps drastically the number of prospective artists who will still feel it necessary to put the European hallmark on their training. Many of the same teachers with whom they, or their fellow students, might have elected to study if they had gone abroad immediately after—or just before—the last war, now are established in America. They have not become any the less able through this transfer of activities, and when they are thought of as having the healthy competition of America's own teachers, it seems fair to assume that this is the land in which to find the best instruction.

The present, however, is not an age of internationally celebrated masters, sought after by the aspiring talent of all lands. There is no Joachim or Auer of the violin, no Liszt or Leszchetizky of the piano, no Marchesi, Lamperti or Garcia of the voice. But the general standard of teaching in all branches of music probably is higher than ever in the past. In America the success of privately endowed music schools, if not a parallel to the work of government subsidized conservatories abroad, probably has stimulated rather than hampered the work of the private teacher, though this is a subject on which two opinions are to be had without difficulty. The Juilliard, Curtis and Eastman schools have made valuable contributions in their opera, orchestral and chamber music activities that have transcended in interest the status of school programs. The American-Composer Concerts at Eastman continue to offer opportunities for new works by Americans to prove their worth and must be reckoned among the country's most valuable musical activities.

Of America's 600 universities and colleges only a few are now without accredited courses in music. Departments or schools of music have been established in a large number of our institutions of higher learning. Practical instruction in applied music is no longer the rarity it was at the beginning of the century. Composition, theory and public school music are subjects looked upon as quite as essential, in many instances, as musical appreciation. Whereas American universities gave comparatively few degrees in music before 1900, their award is now widespread.

Criticism

Criticism in America has not materially altered with the passing of the "Old Guard," though it has fewer illustrious names. Together with criticism in England, it remains the most honest in the world. The only complaints of its fairness that have been given the slightest credence—though, of course, individuals have their personal grievances—have arisen when newspaper reviewers have undertaken to fill additional posts which have seemed to some critics of the critics to bring them into too close an association with artists or organizations that they might be required to write about. With a few exceptions, the metropolitan newspapers have never been more generous in the matter of space permitted their reviewers, and in lesser cities is to be found increasing realization of the need to have reviews competently written, even though most newspapers are not in a position to employ full-time music critics. One grievance of the musician is concerned with a tendency on the part of writers to adhere more and more closely to "timely" subjects in the extended discussions commonly referred to as "Sunday articles," as compared to the past when critics like Hale, Krehbiel and Henderson often turned their backs completely on the news to deal with matters of their own special research, as Ernest Newman has continued to do in his articles for the London Sunday Times. Involved in this are, of course, questions of journalism that apply not only to music but to every other department of a modern newspaper. The "reporting" side of criticism would appear to have been extended as a settled part of American newspaper policy and procedure, and this has been a factor in the virtual elimination from the Sunday pages of articles (not necessarily of a technical nature) which have to do with musical subjects not "in the news."

If this survey of the contemporary musical scene stops here, without even the most cursory examination of the part played by the radio, the phonograph, various contests to stimulate composition or bring out young artists, and the growth of public school music, it is because these and other such developments call for separate treatment.
